The passage

Adapted from the transcript of a video essay on the Bygone Philosophy channel. Paragraphs are numbered for reference.

1 “Every man's chief and real existence,” Arthur Schopenhauer wrote in the 1850s, “is in his own skin, and not in other people's opinions.” In the same essay he warned of what becomes of the man who forgets this: he becomes the slave of what other people are pleased to think. The word is exact. Such a man is not a servant but a slave, for a servant can quit, while a man who needs approval carries his master everywhere: into every meeting, every conversation, and every decision about what to say, what to wear, and what to want. He laughs a little louder at the joke. He agrees a little faster than he believes. He explains himself to people who never asked. At night he replays the day, checking how he came across. Most men live this way without noticing it, and most never learn what happens when it stops.

2 What follows describes, in the order in which it occurs, what happens when a man stops seeking approval.

3 The first change is awareness: he notices how often he was doing it. The moment he resolves to stop, he begins to catch himself—rewriting a message four times so that it sounds right, softening an opinion before anyone has pushed back, telling a story about himself that is slightly better than the truth, explaining a refusal when “no” was a complete answer. The discovery is uncomfortable, because it reveals how much of his day was a performance and how much of his energy went into managing other people's impressions instead of living his own life. He should not resist the discomfort. It is the first sign that he is waking up.

4 The second change is that some people react. When he stops agreeing with everything, someone will be surprised. When he stops saying yes to every request, someone will be disappointed. When he stops laughing at jokes that are not funny, someone will notice the silence, and a few people may withdraw. Those people have not lost him. They have lost a version of him that was built to please them. A relationship that survives only as long as he performs was never a relationship with him; it was a relationship with the performance. This is the stage at which most men turn back, because the discomfort feels like proof that they have made a mistake. It is not proof of a mistake. It is the cost of becoming visible.

5 The third change is that his energy returns. The psychologist Jennifer Crocker spent years studying what she called contingencies of self-worth: the domains in which people believe they must succeed in order to feel worthy. In one study at the University of Michigan, her team followed more than 600 college freshmen through their first year. More than a third reported that other people's approval was important to how they valued themselves. Students whose self-worth rested on external sources—approval, appearance, and outperforming others—fared worse. They reported more stress and more anger, drank and used drugs more, and showed more symptoms of disordered eating. These links held even after the researchers accounted for how high or low the students' overall self-esteem was. The implication is significant. It was not low confidence that harmed these students; it was where their confidence was stored. When a man's worth is held in other people's hands, every interaction becomes a test he can fail. He is always on trial, and a man who is always on trial is always exhausted. When he stops seeking approval, the trial ends, and the energy it consumed returns to him.

6 The fourth change concerns his work. In 1973, at a nursery school on the Stanford campus, the psychologists Mark Lepper, David Greene, and Richard Nisbett studied children who already enjoyed drawing. They told some of the children that if they drew, they would receive a Good Player Award, a certificate with a gold seal and a red ribbon. The children drew and received their awards. One to two weeks later, the researchers quietly set the markers out again during free play and observed. The children who had drawn for the award now spent about half as much of their free time drawing as children who had never been promised anything. They had not lost the ability to draw; they had stopped drawing for themselves. An activity pursued out of love had become an activity pursued for a ribbon, and when the ribbon disappeared, so did the desire. Approval-seeking does the same thing to a man's work. He stops asking whether the work is good and starts asking whether it will be liked. He writes what earns applause, trains for how it looks, and chooses the career that sounds impressive. Gradually, the things he once loved begin to feel like obligations. When he stops seeking approval, he recovers the boy who drew because he wanted to. The work becomes his own again, and work that is truly one's own is almost always better, because attention has returned from the audience to the work.

7 The fifth change is that his relationships deepen. Crocker and her colleague Amy Canevello later followed college students who were sharing dormitory rooms with strangers. Some entered these relationships focused on protecting their image—on making sure they looked good. Others entered them genuinely trying to support the other person. The image-focused students were less likely to report that their relationships were improving, while those who offered support out of real concern built the closest and most supportive relationships. As Canevello put it, we get support by being supportive. Here lies the hidden irony. The man who seeks approval believes he is focused on other people, but he is focused on himself and on how he is coming across. He is not listening to the person in front of him; he is watching his own reflection in that person's eyes. Once he no longer needs approval, he can finally attend to others. He can listen without planning his next impressive line, and he can tell a friend a hard truth because he no longer fears losing the friend's good opinion. People feel the difference.

8 The final change is a paradox: when a man stops seeking approval, people begin to respect him more. Psychologists who study flattery, beginning with Edward Jones in the 1960s, describe what is known as the ingratiator's dilemma. The more obviously a person depends on someone's approval, the more that someone suspects his praise and agreement are a strategy. Flattery is therefore most likely to fail precisely when it is most needed. People sense the need behind it, and need, displayed openly, makes everything a man says worth less. The man who does not need approval is different. When he agrees, his agreement means something, because he would have said so if he disagreed. When he offers praise, it is believed. His yes is worth something because his no is real.

9 This claim requires a qualification. To stop seeking approval is not to stop caring what anyone thinks. A man who ignores every voice is not free; he is merely deaf. Approval and feedback are different things. Approval concerns whether people like him; feedback concerns whether he is right. A strong man stops pursuing the first and actively seeks the second, from the few people whose judgment he has good reason to trust.

10 The process begins with observation. For one week, keep a count of every occasion on which you explain yourself to someone who did not ask, apologize for something that was not wrong, or agree with something you do not believe. Do not judge these moments; simply count them, because a habit cannot be broken until it is seen. Then refuse one request without offering an excuse. Notice how uncomfortable the refusal feels, and notice that nothing collapses. State one honest opinion where you would ordinarily remain silent—not to provoke anyone, but to allow your actual view to exist aloud. Do one thing this week purely because you want to, and tell no one about it: no post, no story, no audience. Finally, choose deliberately the small number of people whose judgment you will take seriously. Everyone else's opinion is weather. You notice it, and you keep walking.

11 Schopenhauer was right. A man's real existence is in his own skin—not in the mind of the person he is trying to impress, not in the comments, and not in the reaction of the room. That is what truly happens when he stops seeking approval: he comes home, and for the first time in a long while, the man living his life is himself.

Section 1: ACT Reading

Directions. The passage is followed by several questions. After reading the passage, choose the best answer to each question. You may refer to the passage as often as necessary. 10 questions · 10 minutes

1. MAIN IDEA

The main purpose of the passage is to:

A. describe, in order, the changes that follow when a person stops seeking approval, and advise how to begin.

B. summarize Schopenhauer's philosophy of human existence.

C. argue that other people's opinions should be ignored entirely.

D. report the results of a single study of college freshmen.

2. DETAIL (EXCEPT)

According to Paragraph 5, students whose self-worth rested on external sources showed all of the following EXCEPT:

F. more stress.

G. more drinking and drug use.

H. more signs of disordered eating.

J. lower overall self-esteem.

3. VOCABULARY IN CONTEXT

As it is used in Paragraph 5 ("it was where their confidence was stored"), the word stored most nearly means:

A. placed.

B. delayed.

C. purchased.

D. concealed.

4. FUNCTION OF A PARAGRAPH

The main function of Paragraph 6 in relation to the passage as a whole is to:

F. offer evidence that an outside reward can replace a person's own reason for doing something, supporting the claim that approval-seeking changes a person's work.

G. criticize nursery schools for giving children awards.

H. introduce the ingratiator's dilemma.

J. show that rewarded children lose the ability to draw.

5. INFERENCE

It can reasonably be inferred from Paragraph 4 that the people who "withdraw" are mainly reacting to:

- A. the end of behavior that had been designed to please them.
- B. new rudeness from the person who changed.
- C. a decline in the person's abilities.
- D. criticism the person directed at them.

6. AUTHOR'S VIEW

The author's attitude toward feedback, as distinguished from approval, is best described as:

- F. dismissive.
- G. favorable, provided it comes from a few trusted people.
- H. suspicious of feedback from any source.
- J. indifferent.

7. CAUSE AND EFFECT

According to Paragraph 8, flattery is most likely to fail when the person giving it:

- A. obviously depends on the other person's approval.
- B. offers it in private.
- C. barely knows the person being flattered.
- D. means every word of it.

8. COMPARISON

In Paragraph 1, the contrast between a servant and a slave mainly suggests that:

- F. servants are paid and slaves are not.
- G. a servant can leave his master, while a person who needs approval carries that need everywhere.
- H. Schopenhauer wrote about the history of slavery.
- J. people who seek approval usually work as servants.

9. ORGANIZATION

Which of the following best describes how Paragraphs 3 through 8 are organized?

- A. A series of consequences presented in the order the author says they occur
- B. A list of objections, each followed by a rebuttal
- C. A chronological account of Schopenhauer's life
- D. A comparison of two competing studies

10. PURPOSE OF A PARAGRAPH

The last paragraph mainly serves to:

F. introduce a new study that supports the main claim.

G. return to the opening quotation and restate the claim through the image of coming home.

H. admit that the author's earlier claims were exaggerated.

J. summarize the findings of Crocker's research.

Section 2: SAT Reading and Writing

Directions. The questions in this section address a number of important reading and writing skills. Each question includes one or more passages. Read each passage and question carefully, and then choose the best answer to the question based on the passage(s). All questions in this section are multiple-choice with four answer choices. Each question has a single best answer. 10 questions · 12 minutes

1. WORDS IN CONTEXT

> Psychologists who study flattery, beginning with Edward Jones in the 1960s, describe what is known as the ingratiator's dilemma. The more obviously a person depends on someone's approval, the more that someone suspects his praise and agreement are a . Flattery is therefore most likely to fail precisely when it is most needed.

Which choice completes the text with the most logical and precise word or phrase?

- A. strategy
- B. compliment
- C. coincidence
- D. sacrifice

2. TEXT STRUCTURE AND PURPOSE

> This claim requires a qualification. To stop seeking approval is not to stop caring what anyone thinks. A man who ignores every voice is not free; he is merely deaf. Approval and feedback are different things. Approval concerns whether people like him; feedback concerns whether he is right.

Which choice best describes the function of the underlined sentence in the text as a whole?

- A. It qualifies the author's advice so that it cannot be read as a call to disregard every opinion.
- B. It presents evidence from a psychological study.
- C. It contradicts the author's main claim about approval.
- D. It describes a common habit of people who seek approval.

3. CENTRAL IDEAS AND DETAILS

> In 1973, at a nursery school on the Stanford campus, psychologists studied children who already enjoyed drawing. They told some of the children that if they drew, they would receive a Good Player Award. One to two weeks later, the children who had drawn for the award spent about half as much of their free time drawing as children who had never been promised anything. They had not lost the ability to draw; they had stopped drawing for themselves.

Which choice best states the main idea of the text?

A. A promised reward appeared to replace the children's own reason for drawing, so they drew less once it was gone.

B. Children draw more skillfully when they are promised an award.

C. Nursery school children prefer certificates to free play.

D. Stanford psychologists studied art education in the 1970s.

4. COMMAND OF EVIDENCE (TEXTUAL)

> The author claims that the harm Jennifer Crocker found among college freshmen came from where students placed their self-worth, not from how much self-esteem they had.

Which quotation from the passage most effectively supports this claim?

A. "Her team followed more than 600 college freshmen through their first year."

B. "More than a third reported that other people's approval was important to how they valued themselves."

C. "These links held even after the researchers accounted for how high or low the students' overall self-esteem was."

D. "They reported more stress and more anger."

5. INFERENCES

> In a 1973 study, children who already enjoyed drawing were told they could win an award for drawing. One to two weeks later, children who had drawn for the award spent about half as much free time drawing as children who had never been promised anything. Because the rewarded children had not lost the ability to draw, the result suggests that

Which choice most logically completes the text?

A. the award had changed why they drew, so their desire to draw left with it.

B. the children had never really enjoyed drawing.

C. the markers had become less appealing over time.

D. children who receive awards draw more skillfully.

6. CROSS-TEXT CONNECTIONS

Text 1 is from the approval essay. Text 2 is from an essay on the seventeenth-century writer Baltasar Gracián.

> Text 1: Then refuse one request without offering an excuse. Notice how uncomfortable the refusal feels, and notice that nothing collapses.
> Text 2: A gilded no is more satisfactory than a dry yes. Some people agree so grudgingly that they receive no credit for agreeing; others decline so graciously that the other person leaves feeling respected. A refusal should not be blunt and final. Let it land gently. Give a genuine reason and, where honesty permits, leave some hope.

Based on the texts, how would the author of Text 2 most likely respond to the advice in Text 1?

A. By cautioning that a bare refusal may land harshly, and recommending a real reason instead

B. By agreeing that refusals should never include reasons

C. By arguing that a person should avoid refusing at all

D. By claiming that discomfort shows a refusal was a mistake

7. RHETORICAL SYNTHESIS

While researching a topic, a student has taken the following notes:

> • In 1973, Mark Lepper, David Greene, and Richard Nisbett studied children at a Stanford nursery school.
> • The children already enjoyed drawing.
> • Some were promised a "Good Player Award" if they drew.
> • One to two weeks later, children who had drawn for the award spent about half as much free time drawing as children who had been promised nothing.

The student wants to present the study's main finding to an audience unfamiliar with it. Which choice most effectively uses relevant information from the notes to accomplish this goal?

A. In a 1973 study, preschoolers who had drawn for a promised award later spent about half as much free time drawing as children who had been promised nothing.

B. Mark Lepper, David Greene, and Richard Nisbett conducted a study at Stanford in 1973.

C. The children in the study already enjoyed drawing before it began.

D. Some children were promised a "Good Player Award," while others were not.

8. TRANSITIONS

> Crocker's team found that students whose self-worth depended on approval reported more stress and more anger. these links held even after the researchers accounted for the students' overall self-esteem.

Which choice completes the text with the most logical transition?

A. However,

B. Moreover,

C. For instance,

D. Instead,

9. BOUNDARIES

> A servant can a man who needs approval carries his master everywhere.

Which choice completes the text so that it conforms to the conventions of Standard English?

- A. quit, but
- B. quit but
- C. quit; but
- D. quit, but,

10. FORM, STRUCTURE, AND SENSE

> The students whose self-worth rested on external sources such as approval, appearance, and outperforming others more stress and more anger.

Which choice completes the text so that it conforms to the conventions of Standard English?

- A. reports
- B. was reporting
- C. reported
- D. has reported

Section 3: ACT English

Directions. In the passages that follow, certain words and phrases are underlined. For each question, choose the alternative you consider best. If you think the original version is best, choose NO CHANGE. Some questions ask about a section of the passage or the passage as a whole.

3 questions · 2 minutes

11. SENTENCE BOUNDARIES

> Those people have not lost him, they have lost a version of him that was built to please them.

Which choice is best for the underlined portion?

- A. NO CHANGE
- B. him. They have lost
- C. him they have lost
- D. him, which has lost

12. REDUNDANCY

> The children drew and received their awards, receiving the certificates they had been promised.

Which choice is best for the underlined portion?

- F. NO CHANGE
- G. awards, receiving certificates.
- H. awards, which were the certificates.
- J. awards.

13. RELEVANCE

> At this point in Paragraph 1, the writer is considering adding the following sentence: "Schopenhauer was born in Danzig in 1788."

Should the writer make this addition here?

- A. Yes, because it gives useful background on the philosopher being quoted.
- B. Yes, because it explains why Schopenhauer wrote about opinions.
- C. No, because it would distract from the paragraph's focus on what happens to a person who needs approval.
- D. No, because it contradicts the date given for Schopenhauer's essay.

Section 4: GRE Verbal Reasoning

Directions. Each question type has its own directions, printed with the question. Text completion and sentence equivalence questions give no partial credit: every blank, or both choices, must be correct. Reading comprehension questions refer to the passage at the front of this booklet.

7 questions · 10 minutes

1. TEXT COMPLETION (ONE BLANK)

> The ingratiator's dilemma suggests that flattery defeats itself: the more a speaker appears, the less his praise is believed.

Select one entry for the blank. Fill the blank in the way that best completes the text.

- A. candid
- B. obsequious
- C. reticent
- D. impartial
- E. laconic

2. TEXT COMPLETION (TWO BLANKS)

> Crocker's findings were notable less for showing that approval-seeking students struggled than for showing that their difficulties were (i) their overall self-esteem: the harm persisted even when that variable was (ii) .

For each blank, select one entry from the corresponding column of choices. Fill all blanks in the way that best completes the text.

Blank (i)	Blank (ii)
☐ independent of	☐ ignored
☐ caused by	☐ accounted for
☐ identical to	☐ exaggerated

3. SENTENCE EQUIVALENCE

> Rather than winning respect, the approval seeker's constant agreement tends to make his opinions seem .

Select the two answer choices that, when used to complete the sentence, fit the meaning of the sentence as a whole and produce completed sentences that are alike in meaning.

Select two answers.

- A. empty
- B. hollow
- C. sincere
- D. persuasive
- E. novel
- F. weighty

4. SENTENCE EQUIVALENCE

> The author is careful to note that freedom from approval is not the same as : a man who ignores every voice is not free, merely deaf.

Select the two answer choices that, when used to complete the sentence, fit the meaning of the sentence as a whole and produce completed sentences that are alike in meaning.

Select two answers.

- A. heedlessness
- B. obliviousness
- C. humility
- D. diligence
- E. deference
- F. candor

5. READING COMPREHENSION (SELECT ALL THAT APPLY)

Consider each of the choices separately and select all that apply. Based on the passage, which of the following does the author present as consequences of no longer seeking approval?

Select all that apply.

- A. Some people may withdraw from the relationship.
- B. The person's energy returns.
- C. The person's overall self-esteem increases.

6. READING COMPREHENSION (SELECT IN PASSAGE)

Select the sentence in Paragraph 8 in which the author explains why the agreement of a person who does not need approval is believable.

1. "Flattery is therefore most likely to fail precisely when it is most needed."
2. "People sense the need behind it, and need, displayed openly, makes everything a man says worth less."
3. "The man who does not need approval is different."
4. "When he agrees, his agreement means something, because he would have said so if he disagreed."
5. "His yes is worth something because his no is real."

7. READING COMPREHENSION (ARGUMENT)

The author uses the 1973 drawing study to conclude that seeking approval makes an adult's work worse. Which of the following, if true, would most seriously weaken that conclusion?

- A. The children in the study already enjoyed drawing before the study began.
- B. Studies of adult employees found that expected rewards did not reduce how much time they chose to spend on their work.
- C. Some children in the study were never promised an award.
- D. Awards and approval both come from other people.
- E. Many adults choose careers partly for prestige.

Section 5: FAST ELA Reading

Directions. Answer the questions about the passage at the front of this booklet. Some questions have two parts: answer Part A first, then Part B. Some questions ask you to select more than one answer; select the number of answers the question asks for.

4 items · 8 minutes

1, Part A. CENTRAL IDEA (EVIDENCE-BASED SELECTED RESPONSE)

Which statement best describes a central idea of the passage?

A. Depending on approval costs a person energy, quality of work, and closeness with others.

B. People who ignore every opinion are the most free.

C. Flattery is the most reliable way to earn respect.

D. Schopenhauer's ideas have been disproved by modern research.

1, Part B. SUPPORTING EVIDENCE (SELECT TWO)

Which two sentences from the passage best support the answer to Part A? Select two.

Select two answers.

A. "He is always on trial, and a man who is always on trial is always exhausted."

B. "At night he replays the day, checking how he came across."

C. "The work becomes his own again, and work that is truly one's own is almost always better, because attention has returned from the audience to the work."

D. "What follows describes, in the order in which it occurs, what happens when a man stops seeking approval."

E. "Psychologists who study flattery, beginning with Edward Jones in the 1960s, describe what is known as the ingratiator's dilemma."

2. FIGURATIVE LANGUAGE (SELECT TWO)

Which two phrases from the passage use figurative language to describe dependence on approval? Select two.

Select two answers.

A. "carries his master everywhere"

B. "followed more than 600 college freshmen"

C. "He is always on trial"

D. "one to two weeks later"

E. "a certificate with a gold seal"

3. AUTHOR'S DEVELOPMENT OF A CLAIM

How does the author develop the claim that people who stop seeking approval earn more respect?

A. By describing a psychological concept and explaining why visible need makes praise less believable

B. By telling a personal story about losing a friend

C. By presenting statistics from a survey of employers

D. By quoting Schopenhauer's views on respect

Section 5, continued: FAST Writing

Prompt. Some people believe a refusal should be short and unexplained. Others believe a refusal should come with a reason. Write an argumentative essay in which you take a position on whether people should explain their refusals. Use evidence from both sources to support your position. Address an opposing claim. Your essay should have an introduction, body paragraphs, and a conclusion, and should be written in a formal style. 45 minutes

Source 1: the passage at the front of this booklet. Paragraphs 8, 9, and 10 bear most directly on refusing.

Source 2: from "The Socially Intelligent"
On refusing, Gracián offers one of the finest lines in the book: “A gilded no is more satisfactory than a dry yes.” Some people agree so grudgingly that they receive no credit for agreeing; others decline so graciously that the other person leaves feeling respected. A refusal should not be blunt and final. Let it land gently. Give a genuine reason and, where honesty permits, leave some hope. “Not this month, but ask me again in the spring” is often received better than a resentful yes.
